MONDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 6.

Moral of the Musketo Murder. A giddy Master Musketo said To his father fond and mother true—"I reckon before I go to bed

I will browse around for an hour or two." "My child," said his ma, 'at is very late. And I hate to have you out o' nights; Many a youth has mut his fate Running around and seeing the sights."

"Beware my child," said his pa discreet, With a wink as his son prepared to go; "Beware of the women you chance to meet-They're dangerous people to tackle, you know. Master Musketo shook his head,

And a sort of a cynical smile he smiled : He didn't care what his parents said, The giddy, thoughtless, frivolous child. Out of the August night and dew,

Out of the moon beam's mellow light, In through a window wide he flaw, Singing along in his merry flight. And his silly heart best high, I'll vouch,

And his giddy brain was all aglow As he spied an arm on a downy couch— An arm as soft and white as snow. At the t'other end of that comely arm

And she looked so innocent and so calm That Master Musketo pined for her gore. Down on that arm he swooped and lit, Bating his music all so shril!— Down on that arm he bore and bit

Was a maiden bymning a virgin snore,

And stroked his sides as he drank his fill. Well, ah well! the snoring stops, And a virgin up on her elbow leans, And a maiden hand like a mallet drops

Smashing our friends into a smitherecous. O, youth ! the moral herein you find Should all of your solemnest thoughts engage;
If our friend had avoided womankind,
He might have lived to a ripe old age. - Eugene Field.
